THE DAILY CRITIC,
P. O. Box 707, 511 Ninth street.

Saturday, June 11, 1881.
To the Readers and Patrons of the Daily Critic.

THE CRITIC ceases with this issue to be published as a penny paper. Successive enlargements had years ago brought it to the limit of such expansion as could be afforded without an increase of price. But the growth of the city in population, wealth and business, and the favor extended by advertising patrons and the public, unite to justify another step forward. Accordingly, THE CRITIC will appear on Monday in an enlarged form, and the price will be increased to Two Cents. In the change of organization by which this enlargement is accompanied THE CRITIC submits to the law of development, which, in this era, is characteristic of so many prosperous enterprises. The enterprises that thrive in this latter part of the Nineteenth century are those that keep increasing their capital and enlarging their scope. And the great instrument through which capital is brought together in the necessary amounts is joint-stock incorporation. It is corporate enterprise that builds the railroad, tunnels the mountain, digs the ship canal, propels the steamship and lays the ocean cable. It is corporate enterprise mainly that carries on the world's manufacturing and mining industries and the large operations of commerce; and such are the growing demands of modern journalism that, with comparatively few exceptions, corporate enterprise alone is found adequate to meet them.

As the proprietors of THE DAILY CRITIC merge their interests with those of others in an enlarged undertaking, they feel some pride in having nurtured to its present stage the thrifty plant which corporate enterprise now essays to bring to a fuller development. At the same time, they gratefully recognize their obligations for the many favors received from liberal patrons, the kindness of contemporaries, the approval and forbearance of readers, and the good feeling manifested by citizens of this District. In retiring from a position of sole control to one of co-operation with others, it is a source of much satisfaction to them that the principles of independence and impartiality upon which they have conducted THE CRITIC are heartily endorsed by their new coadjutors, and they take especial pleasure in the conviction that, however much new support THE EVENING CRITIC may win by its enlarged facilities as a newspaper, it will not fail to deserve the friendship and esteem of the old supporters of THE DAILY CRITIC by a careful adherence to all those traditions of business and editorial management which have heretofore received so large a share of public approval.

JOHN G. Saxe has been so long regarded as a birth producer, that the nation has learned to think of him as a well of pure English ever bubbling over with rippling tides of laughter-provoking rhymes. To connect sorrow and settled melancholy with his name is difficult, and yet we are told that a long series of domestic bereavements have affected his health and spirits most disastrously. Within one year he has lost by death his wife, mother, and a tenderly loved daughter-in-law and is now, much broken by such a sad dissolution of his home circle.

NEXT MONDAY THE CRITIC will be issued under the new management.

It is the determination of the management to make THE EVENING CRITIC a live, spicy and newsy paper, worthy in every respect of the patronage of the people of the District. It will be independent in politics as in everything else. It will give all the news in an attractive and readable shape. It will be thoroughly identified with the interests of the community. It will be no party's nor no man's organ. It will be published to make money for its publishers and to give the people a first-class evening paper.

Its price will be two cents per copy. Subscribers will be served by careful and prompt carriers at 35 cents per month. Subscription books now open.

Advertisers will find THE EVENING CRITIC a first-class medium for making their wants known to the public.

Further than this we are willing to let the forthcoming issues of the paper speak for themselves.

THAT VERY paternal sovereign Louis XIV, of every graceful but not very gracious memory, once sent a present of a Dutch pump and a lot of leather buckets to his faithful city of Quebec, as a delicate hint that it ought to try to put out its own fires. Exactly two hundred years have elapsed since that event, surely time enough for even the slowest community to take a hint, but Quebec seems not to have done it. There is a choice lot of old history, archives and bric-a-brac generally, gathered into that old town by virtue of its ancestry, and it ought to make a little effort to preserve these things for future ages, and the rest of the world, even if the very conservative population does not care to consider the safety of its own homes and people. From the accounts of the conflagration, it must be inferred that the water supply is manifestly insufficient, and that by the peculiarity of the local system, when a demand is made in one section of the town, the other must go dry. Probably because brought up from infancy in the knowledge of this special city arrangement, the citizens seem particularly prone to lose their wits in a fire. All accounts unite in confessing that everybody unanimously agreed in standing in everybody else's way, and thus complicated the matter into absolute confusion for the general advantage of the thieves. While full of sympathy with the inevitable distress that must follow such a public calamity, and with its hand already in its pocket to subscribe promptly the material aid that is so sorely needed by the houseless sufferers, it really seems as if the rest of the world had the right to advise the handsome old city to take this opportunity for examining its waterworks.

To MANY Americans the name of Cadet Edwin St. John Greble, graduate at West Point, will recall a flood of tender memories. His father was the first Union officer killed in the late war. He fell at Big Bethel, Va., June 10, 1861, engaged, as it was then believed, with troops led by officers who had been the guests of his own table in Philadelphia. The community was at that time yet unused to the horrors of war, and many flags were placed at half mast for his memory by his fellow citizens, while it was observed with admiration that the stout patriot, his father, kept his banner floating free, while his grieving mother refused herself the conventional comfort of a darkened dwelling with the declaration that it was no time for the exhibition of a private grief, that might depress the spirits of the public at a moment when all should be both hopeful and helpful.

THERE are so many new things being invented and discovered that even the unabridged dictionary is in danger of running short. Everybody reads; almost everybody writes, and a good many people even go so far as to think, and in consequence the regular standard supply of vocabulary is subjected to a constantly increasing demand. A new word is a great public benefaction, especially when it tersely and exactly expresses a somewhat complex fact or comprehensive idea that is difficult of elaboration or definition.

The invention of the telephone has, while bestowing a great benefit upon society, brought also a heavy obligation in the added burden that is felt by the community in dealing with the new fact in common conversation. The weight of this infliction may be materially relieved by the introduction of the proposed word "sonorousness." It looks well, sounds well, and appears to be legitimate, and can be conveniently used to express the phenomena connected with the telephone and the conversion of intermittent radiations into sound. The term is to be ascribed to Mr. E. H. Cook, who offers it to the public in the Philosophical Magazine.

A SUDDEN crop of ready-made jokes springs up at the announcement that Capt. Albert I. Fair, the present occupant of General Washington's birthplace, in Westmoreland, Va., has discovered a little hatchet which was brought to light recently by the plow. It has been sent to Mt. Vernon and, of course, everybody is ready with a little joke, original or selected, for immediate application.

The iconoclastic spirit of our age is well shown in the special spite and venom provoked by this poor, innocent and harmless historic incident. It has been so torn to tatters that it is no longer possible to treat it with any of the deference that it deserves. At our centennial exposition was exhibited a very graceful piece of statuary. A handsome lad, alert and vigorous, was delineated with such skill as to claim attention from the passing throng. Shown stopped to admire and wonder at it, but gradually, as every gazer penetrated the meaning of the sculptor, a smile would rise, and almost every American, amid audible laughter, would exclaim in accents of perplexity—"It must be Washington with his little hatchet!" The foreign sculptor, who had chosen the theme as appropriate to the occasion, and complimentary to the sentiment of the American people, must have been very much surprised at the expressions of opinion which it elicited.

LONDON society is enjoying the pleasing amusement of laughing at its own last folly repeated tellingly by the clever mimicry and artistic exaggerations of the stage. The success of the travesty must be accepted as a cheering proof that the aesthetic craze has over-reached its climax, and that the satiated devotees have regained sufficient energy to laugh at their own nonsensical vagaries. The triumph of "The Colonel" at the Prince of Wales Theatre has been greatly assisted by the cleverness of Miss Gioletta Arditi, the daughter of the celebrated operatic conductor. The lady has heretofore appeared as a singer, but she has abandoned the opera to assume this new part, to which she brings remarkable talent and address. She is the foremost heroine of a group of actresses, the latest of a limp lot. She flops, she sighs, she finds the deep, the broad and the far-reaching all in an old teapot. Upon every available occasion she becomes quite too utterly utter, while in portraying the very sublimity of senselessness she changes naturally from attitude to attitude with a grace which makes every pose a fit study for an artist.

The general revival of interest in antiquated art is indicated by the prices paid in recent sales for the works of French painters of the eighteenth century. Pictures of Lancret's showed a remarkable advance; one sold in 1851 at 3,000 francs was purchased lately for 110,000 francs; while another, which in 1844 brought 555 francs, has been just sold for 60,000 francs. This is of course the unusual advance accorded to a special popularity, but many other pictures have been sold at such remarkable prices that it is almost safe to say, that in case of any good French picture of the eighteenth century the advance from the estimated values of forty years ago can be stated at an average by adding a figure to the end of the blue. Probably some of these prices may be due to the freak of fashion, but a number of famous Dutch pictures have recently changed owners at a marked increase in price, and the purchase of a good piece of art may be considered as a sensible investment for some superfluous cash, even when regarded only in the light of the market.

IN THE reports published by the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labor it is stated as a fact which applies all over the country, that in all mills where women and children predominate among the operatives, the hours of labor are as a rule eleven, or even more. In other mills where men predominate the hours are fixed at ten. The report presses the point, that in a land which directly aims at the establishment of equality and justice no such additional burden should be placed upon the weak, the helpless and the dependent.
